BARNHAVEN, in 1960, OFFERS FOR YOUR SHADIER GARDEN SPOTS

the world's most beautiful primroses -- the original and only Silver-Dollar Strain.

For complete descriptions and culture, refer to your 36-page Catalog, No. 16. Recommended by both Good Housekeeping and The New Yorker, the catalog is now in low supply which necessitates a 25c charge for replacements.

This June we sail to New Zealand and Australia, by way of the South Seas, on a working holiday to lecture and to see the Barnhaven Silver-Dollar Strain of primroses as grown and exhibited there. For those of you who wish them, transplants will be shipped from February to June and field plants in June, only. Seeds will be available from January through December.

The larger-than-dollar size and elegance of Barnhaven primroses have come to be expected, but the limitless sequence of colors, shades and tints continue to catch and hold the breath of all who see them. No color is wanting. We will see them in the fire-opal tropical sunsets of Tahiti and Queensland, in the vermilion, coral and turquoise life flashing in the waters of the Great Barrier Reef, and in the cool pastels of the strange flowers of Victoria and Tasmania as we follow the spring south from tropical to temperate Australia from July through October.

Upon our return to Barnhaven in February of '61, our journey, like many of yours, will be a daily one to the garden still shrouded in the chill, grey monotone of late winter. There, as we watch the colors of tropical sunsets and exotic scenes flare again in the budding primroses, we could well recall Bacon's words, still true after three centuries, that gardening is the purest pleasure in the world and the greatest refreshment to the spirit of man.
